Transforming vacant and derelict land in Scotland

TREFITY VACANI

Funding sources for bringing vacant and derelict land back into use

Vacant and derelict land, whatever the size, affects our communities and their potential. Over time derelict sites can damage an area, resulting in social, economic and environmental harm. However, these sites also present opportunities for regeneration and renewal – unlocking growth, reviving communities and reducing inequalities. There is a wide variety of funding options available to communities and local authorities to help bring the land back into use and benefit those living around vacant and derelict sites.

This table provides a brief description of different funding sources available, highlighting the main limitations of each and indicating what type of activity the funding is most suitable for. Individual funding options are not mutually exclusive, and a mix of sources is often used by groups for financing projects. The circumstances of the community involved and the development opportunity it is seeking to finance will influence which source – or combination of sources – are used.

Further Information

In 2020 the Scottish Land Commission created the Vacant and Derelict Land Taskforce, bringing together a host of public and private agencies to transform the existing approach to bringing those abandoned and unloved urban spaces back into productive use.

The findings and recommendations of the Taskforce can be found on our website: landcommission.gov.scot/ notsoprettyvacant Further information about our work on vacant and derelict land can be found at www.landcommission.gov.scot
